What is Clinical Psychology?

• Clinical psychology provides comprehensive mental and behavioral health care for individuals, families, and communities, addressing a wide range of mental and behavioral health problems. It involves integrating knowledge from various disciplines and addressing various age groups, diverse backgrounds, and changing frameworks. Clinical psychologists work in various settings, including counseling centers, schools, and community health centers, and may be required by courts or insurance companies to perform mental assessments and provide medication recommendations.
To become an authorized clinical psychologist, one must complete a licensed clinical brain research program and undergo clinical preparation. This includes obtaining a BS or BA degree in psychology, passing the GRE Brain Test, obtaining a doctoral degree in clinical brain research, completing an internship, passing national and state brain research exams, and obtaining state licensure. This certification allows for legally-enforceable compensation as a clinical psychologist.
Average Salary

- Clinical psychologists earn an average yearly salary of $90,130, with real pay rates varying based on specialization, field, and experience. The BLS (Bureau of Labor Statistics) reports that 10% earn more than $168,790. Compensation increases with experience. The profession is expected to grow 11.4% by 2032, driven by increased demand in schools, clinics, mental health centers, and social services organizations.
Where do Clinical Psychologist work?

- Whereas the endless larger part of clinical psychologists works in independent practice or at universities and college framework, numerous work in healing centers, clinics, and schools. Here is where the BLS says psychologists are working today: Elementary and secondary schools—27% Private practice—27% Healthcare services—21% Government facilities—9% Hospitals—5%.
Career options

- Clinical Psychologists have many different job options they can choose from. Here are some choices:
  - Substance Abuse Counselor
  - Human Resources Position
  - Family/Marriage Counselor
  - Forensic Psychologists
  - Children's Psychologists
  - Learning Disabilities Specialist
Thank you